

UNSPOKEN LOVE

A Novel by
Charan Sai Ponnada

"Some people become memories before they ever become ours."

AUTHOR'S NOTE

Hello,

If you're reading this, thank you.

You probably arrived here from one of the letters.

Maybe a line reminded you of someone.

Maybe it reminded you of a version of yourself you haven't thought about in a while.

Unspoken Love was never meant to be just a love story.

It's a story about noticing.

About the people who change us without realizing it.

About college corridors, unfinished conversations, unsent messages, friendships that become lifelines, and the strange way memories refuse to leave.

Most of all, it's for anyone who has ever loved quietly.

I hope you find a piece of yourself in these pages.

— Charan Sai Ponnada

CHAPTER 1 (summarized)

The world looked ordinary that morning.

The same buildings.

The same classrooms.

The same sleepy faces pretending to be awake.

Nothing about that day felt important.

At least not at first.

If someone had asked me what was about to happen, I would've laughed.

Because some moments don't arrive with music.

They don't announce themselves.

They walk in quietly.

And then they stay.

I don't remember what lecture we had that morning.

I don't remember what was written on the board.

I don't even remember what I was supposed to be paying attention to.

But I remember looking up.

And I remember her.

Not her name.

Not her voice.

Not even her face clearly.

Just a feeling.

The strange certainty that something had shifted.

And somehow, years later, that's still the part I remember most.

A FEW LINES FROM THE BOOK

"The world looked ordinary.

Then she walked through it.

And it hasn't looked ordinary since."

—

"I forgot the lecture.

I forgot the date.

But I remembered the green."

—

"Once you notice something about a person, you can never un-notice it."

Thank you for reading.

More letters arrive daily at:

@lone_melodies

If these pages felt familiar,

perhaps Unspoken Love was written for you. 🌿